Wikipedia: Probability Interpretation. Probability is simply the chance of something happening. We can't know for sure what will happen, but we can estimate the likelihood of different outcomes. This is the basis of probability theory, which is used in many fields, including science, economics, and sports. In sports, probability is used to predict the outcome of games and events. For example, in football, we can use probability to estimate the chance of a team winning, drawing, or losing. In basketball, we can use probability to estimate the chance of a player making a shot or a team winning a game. In tennis, we can use probability to estimate the chance of a player winning a set or a match. In baseball, we can use probability to estimate the chance of a player getting a hit or a team winning a game. In hockey, we can use probability to estimate the chance of a team winning a game. In soccer, we can use probability to estimate the chance of a team winning a game. In basketball, we can use probability to estimate the chance of a player making a shot or a team winning a game.
